Bow Wood, Staplecross, East Sussex

Description

Bow Wood is a delightful young woodland located a short distance southeast of the village of Staplecross and is part of a peaceful wider gated woodland.

Situated among fertile loamy clay soils that slope gently southeast, the maturing canopy planted approximately 25 years ago predominantly comprises oak, occasional ash and hornbeam (known for its decent firewood properties). Flanking the north boundary is an attractive blend of crab apple, damson (great for a gin enthusiast!), hawthorn, sycamore and field maple. Patches of gorse, primrose, saw-wort, foxglove and orchid provide delightful colour to the copse during the summer months. A ride along the west boundary affords good additional access, particularly should a new owner wish to extract a little firewood for the hearth, taking advantage of the current Forestry Commission thinning licence.

A number of wildlife species are enticed by the serenity of the woodland; deer (muntjac and roe), fox, badger, woodpecker, skylark, long-tailed tit, buzzard and acoustic songsters are abundant in number.

Bow Wood is one of few places in the southeast of England out of earshot of the drone of traffic and offers blissful tranquillity. It benefits from vehicular access along a hard surfaced track navigable with a 2WD vehicle at all times of the year.

If It Were Mine

As a keen beekeeper, I would consider moving my hives to the woodland. I would also clear a space within the copse to create a secluded area to hang a hammock for occasional overnighting, perhaps also having a barbeque from time to time during the summer.
