Travers Wood, Stocksfield, Northumberland

Description

Travers Wood occupies gently sloping and near-level ground within a larger broadleaf woodland known as Hyons Wood, some 2 miles south-west of Prudhoe. Hexham is about 10 miles to the northwest and Newcastle a similar distance to the east. Both are easily reached in half an hour via the A69.

What was a scene of Victorian mining is now a place of tranquillity. Set amidst over 200 acres of surrounding woodland, Travers supports an array of native tree species. Stands of elegant birch stems are peppered with open-grown oak and a few mature beech of considerable size. There are gaps and glades throughout giving a bright and airy feel. Beneath the trees are small groups of holly (some of good size), along with scattered hazel and hawthorn. In patches of damper ground you will also see the occasional willow and alder.

This varied habitat is attractive to the local residents. Animal trails criss-cross the wood and roe deer can often be glimpsed in the glades and thickets. At dusk they are joined by badgers and foxes. The trees were alive with birdsong when we visited while buzzards and red kites circled overhead. We also saw a few game birds including pheasant and woodcock.

Travers Wood is served by a well-found hard track (suitable for 2WD access) which links to a private parking spur on its southern side for 'in-wood' parking. The smooth terrain and largely clean woodland floor makes for easy pedestrian access across most of the wood – ideal for both recreation and management.

Travers demands little in the way of management but offers plenty of scope for the recreational forester.

If It Were Mine

I'd like to see a wider variety of native species so would plant some fruiting shrubs and trees in a few open spaces. Cherry, rowan, wych elm, blackthorn and elder are all candidates.

A mown area within one of the glades would make a lovely secret retreat for woodland recreation and the odd night under the stars.

Please remember some management operations require approval and/or a licence.
